Treatment of Rabies: Wounds produced by the bite of an animal, in which there is any possibility of rabies, should at once be cauterized with "fuming" or strong nitric acid. The acid is best applied with a glass rod thoroughly to all parts of the wound. Punctured wounds should be laid open to allow proper cauterization.

Thorough cauterization with nitric acid reduces the danger of wound complications, and experience demonstrates that wounds promptly and thoroughly cauterized with nitric acid are seldom followed by rabies. Prompt application of nitric acid is essential since its effectiveness decreases with time.

Nitric acid, on account of its diffusibility and penetration, is almost specific for rabies. The resultant tumefaction soon recedes and the wound heals well while little if any additional scarring is produced.
